After a two-year, Covid-enforced absence, the musical extravaganza got off to a flying start at Dereham Memorial Hall courtesy of headliners When Rivers Meet and Kyla Brox. A sell-out crowd was left beaming from ear to ear on Wednesday evening as Dereham Blues Festival made a triumphant return.

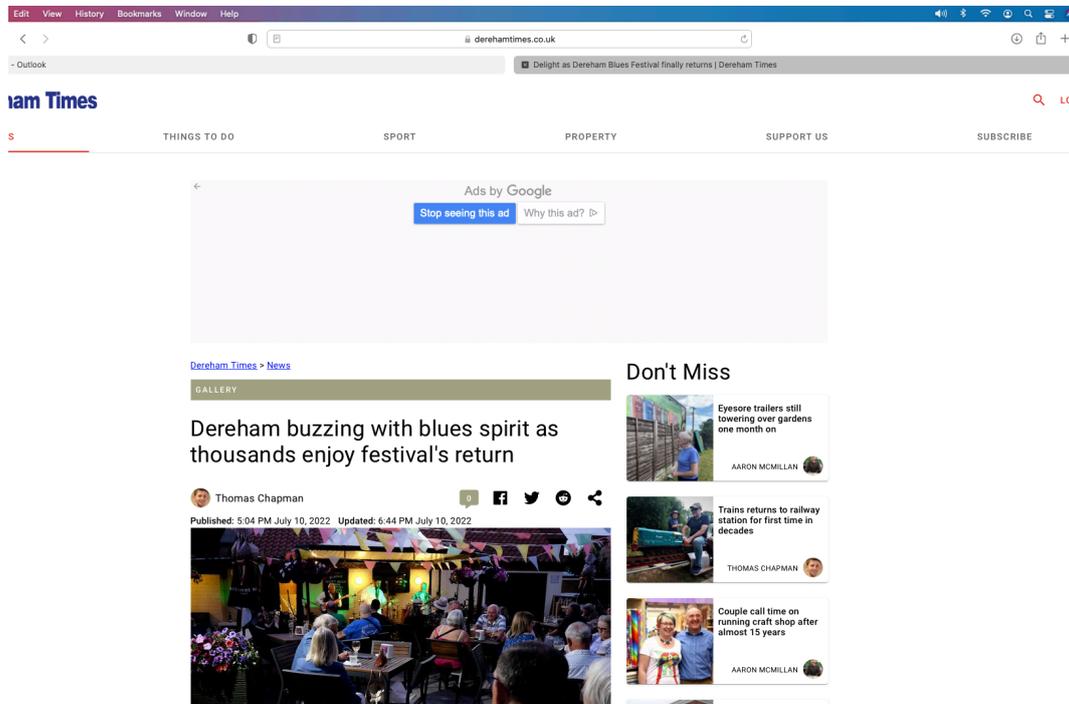

They were capably supported by local community choir Rockavox, who performed in the bar area before the main gig began.

The popular event, which has been attracting thousands of blues enthusiasts to mid Norfolk since 2013, is now set to continue with another four days of entertainment.

Blues fever swept Dereham over the weekend as a beloved music festival finally made its comeback.

Organisers of Dereham Blues Festival had promised a "bigger festival than we have ever seen before" following a two-year absence due to Covid. And they certainly kept their promise as the five-day extravaganza delivered a huge variety of music from around 70 bands and artists, playing in 20 unique venues.

Then came another four days of entertainment in venues from pubs and bars to sports and social clubs, including everything from classic blues to rock and roll.

For the first time ever, this year's edition even offered an open-air busking event at Ellenor Fenn Garden on Saturday afternoon, giving up-and-coming acts the chance to showcase their talents.

[Dereham Times - 12th July] Organisers overwhelmed as return of Dereham Blues Festival proves a big hit

The screenshot shows a web browser displaying the Dereham Times website. The main article is titled "Organisers overwhelmed as return of Dereham Blues Festival proves a big hit" by Thomas Chapman, published on July 12, 2022. The article includes a photograph of two women shaking hands. To the right of the main article is a "Don't Miss" section with three smaller articles: "Eyesore trailers still towering over gardens one month on", "Couple call time on running craft shop after almost 15 years", and "Door staff disarmed man with metal pole outside Wetherspoon pub".

The organisers of Dereham Blues Festival were over the moon after the musical extravaganza proved a big success on its return after two years away.

Venues across the town were packed with punters from Thursday to Sunday as thousands of blues enthusiasts descended on mid Norfolk.

A "bigger festival than ever before" had been promised in the build-up to the event, and it certainly delivered following a two-year, Covid-enforced absence.

Around 70 bands and artists played in 20 venues, with some, such as Darby's in Swanton Morley, getting involved for the first time.

Doreen Aitken, festival secretary, said the whole organising committee was delighted with the outcome after months of hard work.

"We wanted something that would raise everybody's spirits after Covid, and I think we did that," added Mrs Aitken.

"The festival has been tremendously missed. There were some people who were massively impacted by Covid, and this was a release for them.

It wasn't just fans who came from far and wide for the blues festival, but artists too."It was incredible to see so many happy, smiling faces.

Some travelled from as far afield as Ireland and Scotland to be involved, demonstrating just how much the event has grown since the inaugural edition in 2013.

Mrs Aitken said she was pleased to see so many young people enjoying a genre often stereotyped as being for "old timers". You can see how much joy it brings to people."
